“Building environmental security implies the consideration of the effects of the environment on peoples’ livelihoods, and the effect of those livelihoods on the environment at the local and regional levels... Most of the papers in this issues of Regional Development Dialogue (RDD) focus on the following central questions: to what extent and in what way do local, regional, and national forces influence the nature and rate of environmental change within locales? How do nonlocal actors and institutions, either separately or in concert with local actors and institutions, influence the character and rate of environmental degradation and restoration in particular areas?”

Extract from Editorial Introduction by Pradyumna P. Karan
Professor, Geography and Japan Studies
University of Kentucky

For policy makers, government officials, professional planners, and members of the research community...
